“ I just want to remember Uncle Herman as a selfless and understanding individual who never hesitated to go beyond his limitations. Especially, when someone else needed a shoulder to lean on or an ear to listen. I remember visiting their home in New York on occasion and not being intimidated to ask him to tell me stories about certain events I became interested in, or when he walked me to the subway station when he felt it was too late to go by myself. My brother, my sister and I became an extended part of his family and he never made us feel otherwise. I never lost touch with him even after the moved away from Brooklyn, and even after I got married and moved to another country. Our bond was forever there. My family will miss him and will never forget him. Men who live selfless lives always endure in the hearts of those whose lives they have touched.
